Full circle management of natural resources is a fundamental aspect of traditional forestry but has yet to be fully realized in the urban and community sector. As interest in urban and community wood utilization is growing throughout the country, it is important to understand the current atmosphere in the southern region.

How much wood is being wasted? Who are the stakeholders? What are the barriers to implementing full circle management in urban and community forests?

Responses to these questions, current activities, plans for engagement and the vision for building a robust and connected urban and community wood utilization network in the southern region will be explored in this presentation.
